He found, he said, that he could not keep the houses in repair, pay the city taxes, etc., and that he went to a certain attorney here to employ his services, saying that he wanted to convey the property to some person who would in return for said conveyance keep the property in repair and pay him so much per month until his death. He claims that two contracts were made, neither of which was kept for more than a few months. The second contract was made, according to his story, while he was in the city jail where he was sent for ten days as a suspicious character. When released from jail he was ordered by the authorities to leaye the city, and went to Norfolk. He says he continued to receive his monthly payments for about six months, but the last one came to him June 2. 1894. His letters calling for settlements were without avail. These incendiary attempts following the burning of the Savannah Grocery Company's building Tuesday morning, and the discovery that the building had been fired in almost the same way as the Schwarz building, by breaking a pane of glass, and admitting the fire-bus, who started the fire in the lard-room, have caused much apprehension. Leftwich, of Henrico, whose bill of $55 fog attending the county poor was scaled down to $25 over his protest by the supervisors, denied in the meeting that he had charged for more visits than that he had charged for more visits had he had paid. Under the present system the Overseer of the Poor can employ any physician he chooses to visit the poor who are not inmates of the almshouse. He gives him a ticket which is good for five visits, and for which the county

Dr. Leftwich had eleven of these tickets, which he attached to his bill us youchers. He said, however, that in some ases he only paid one or two visits, and that in others he found it necessary to visit the patient ten to twenty times, and that he simply put all the visits paid together, and then averaged them.

The board held that where less than five visits were made only the number made should be paid for, and where there were controlled that where the transfer of the should be paid for. were more only five should be paid for, and therefore the bill was scaled down.
